

Day 16 – Our Day in London

Today was our first day in London. After getting up early and having a pretty uneventful morning at the hotel, we gathered at the coach at half past eight, where we headed off to our first destination of the day: Greenwich. It is, if you don't already know, located at the prime meridian. We didn't really do much there except from getting soaked in rain, admire the cool line that runs through the city (prime meridian) and walk around. After that we took a ferry across the Thames, the famous river that runs through London. The entire tour took us about an hour and was pretty cool, considering the fact that our tour led us under the Tower And London Bridge. Then we finally arrived at our main destination of the day – Central London! It was jampacked with our programme and lots of stuff, up to the point where I genuinely can't think of a sight we hadn't visited. I'm talking about Houses of Parliament, Big Ben, Nelson's Column, Trafalgar Square, etc.. All of this in under 10 minutes. We also walked down a street called „The Mall“. It is often shown when big British events such as the coronation are broadcast on TV. We sang a very mediocre rendition of the British national anthem there, also known as „The most boring song in the world“. We arrived at Trafalgar Square after some walking, where we were given freetime in central London. (We ended up in a mediocre and overprized pizza restaurant.) After all of that had been finished, we arrived back at our coach and went back to our hotel in Wembley. (On our way there Mr. Adam explained quite literally every sight we saw along the way.) We grabbed some food and went to sleep after having packed our stuff for the next day to return to Germany.
