

Day 6 – Trip to Plymouth

After a pleasant school day we headed to Plymouth. During the bus ride, Mr Adam (who is a geek in history and plenty of other stuff), informed us about this remarkable city. It's known as the biggest city in the county Devon. It's located in the southwest of England. It has got a huge harbour, which is called „The Barbican“. Anyway, after approximately one hour we arrived. Actually we didn't really want to leave the bus because it was BLOODY ENGLISH WEATHER. But obviously we had to. Outside our teachers handed out a map of Plymouth. We were actually supposed to use them, but frankly no one did, except from the ones who forgot to charge their phones. The rest depended on Google Maps. Our task was: „Take seven photos of sights you know or were presented in your previous English textbook!“. For those who don't know: Our first text- and exercise books were about Plymouth and its sights. One of these photos must include a random person from Plymouth. On another photos seven strangers should be shown and so on It was filled with entertaining subtasks. (which would have probably been more entertaining in sunny weather). Then we were split into groups and commenced completing the tasks, It was also meant to be freetime, so we bought some food for lunch. After we had finished, we had to meet at Smeaton's Tower. That's a lighthouse located on the hill called „The Hoe“. We had the opportunity to be led by a guide to the top of the tower. We had to pay on our own, but it wasn't expensive though. After everyone had arrived we walked down to the Lido. This is a huge circle shaped swimming pool located right at the water. The school book also referred to it, so it was also a significant spot we should have at least seen. And then it was already time to walk back to our coach and depart from Plymouth to Torquay where our school and host families are. We were brought there safely and without and coincidence.
